6-1-2019

The value of a perioperative nurse

Nicholas Ralph
Nicholas.Ralph@usq.edu.au

Follow this and additional works at: https://www.journal.acorn.org.au/jpn

Part of the Health Services Administration Commons, Health Services Research Commons, Perioperative, Operating Room and Surgical Nursing Commons, and the Surgery Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://doi.org/10.26550/2209-1092.1059

https://www.journal.acorn.org.au/jpn/vol32/iss2/1

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by Journal of Perioperative Nursing. It has been accepted for inclusion in Journal of Perioperative Nursing by an authorized editor of Journal of Perioperative Nursing.
ACORN

The Australian College of Perioperative Nurses (ACORN) is a registered Australian company and health promotion charity. It exists to serve its members, the perioperative profession, the patient and the community to promote the prevention and control of disease.

ACORN’s vision is for Australian patients to receive the safest and highest quality evidence-based perioperative care in the world.

ACORN Board of Directors

Rebecca East
President

Trent Batchelor
Director

Patricia Flood
Director

Karen Hay
Director

Grace Loh
Director

Paula Foran
Member Director

Sophie Ehrlich
Director

Donna Stevens
Director

Garry Stratton
Director

Journal Committee Chair, Acting Journal Editor and Research Committee Chair

Conference Committee Chair and Professional advocacy and advisory liaison

Hospital and University Collaboration and Accreditation Committee Chair

Grants, Awards and Scholarships Committee Chair

Member Director

Membership and Local Associations Liaison Committee Chair

Education Programs Committee Chair

Education Committee Chair

Finance, Audit and Risk Committee Chair

The value of a perioperative nurse

I was not drawn to perioperative nursing because of a love of surgery1–4 (though this was something I had, and still have). And it wasn’t a love of the changing nature of the environment5–8 (even though this too was a factor) or the sheer spectacle of the perioperative environment9–11 (although I did find it alluring). It was, in fact, because of a situation I witnessed years ago when a terrified young woman faced the prospect of surrendering her dignity, her control and her self to the surgical team.

The young woman – a first-time ‘flyer’ – shook with fear at the thought of being poked and prodded by strange people, being put to sleep by strange drugs and being cut with a cold steel knife in an attempt to treat her condition. I watched her passively, being told not to move as the observer in the room. I drank it all in – the glint of the surgical instruments neatly laid out on the table, the hum of the warming device, the soft beep of the machines. Suddenly a masked stranger appeared beside the girl with barely a word. The girl winced as a cannula was driven into her vein. As I watched I could see the story on her face. It said simply, ‘I’m afraid’.

Someone else also saw this fear on her face. Out of the corner of the theatre, they sidled up to the young woman whose knuckles were white from clinging to the bed rails. The person introduced themselves, talking to the young woman in a friendly and comforting yet professional manner. They jovially but kindly introduced the team and spoke to the young woman about what would happen and who was there to care for her. I remember seeing the rapport building between the two of them like the flames of a warming fire and the calm, soothing voice filled with reassurance like the captain of an aircraft during turbulence. The meaning behind the words was clear – the theatre team were thoroughly prepared and equipped with expertise and knowledge. The fear on the young woman’s face began to wash away as this person made a promise to her, ‘I won’t leave you while you’re asleep, OK? I’ll be with you and watching over you until you wake up’. In less than two minutes, without drugs or a device being used, the young woman was transformed from a trembling mess into a calm and collected soul.

I was impressed beyond words and filled with questions. Who was this person? Where did they learn to do this? What sort of health professional are they? This was my first introduction to a perioperative nurse. Someone who made a profound impact during one of the most vulnerable periods of a person’s life12,13.

In today’s perioperative environment, ‘throughput’ is so often emphasised ahead of thorough care14–16. My fear is that the meaning and function of the nursing role will be forgotten amidst efficiency drives and the constant push to do more with less17. Yet the problem of long elective surgery waiting lists will not be solved by skimping on five minutes spent reassuring a patient. Perioperative nursing’s brand must therefore be centred firmly on the value it fulfils in providing comprehensive care to people when they are at their most vulnerable. In the words of a famous report in the failings of hospital care, our emphasis should always be ‘patients ... not numbers, people ... not statistics’. When we follow this precept, we create our own value and establish the nature by which we make a difference to the health of so many Australians.

Editor’s note

Since taking over in late 2017 as editor of this journal, I have been privileged to work with a terrific and dedicated team of people at the Australian College of Perioperative Nurses. A recent career opportunity has led to my decision to step aside as Journal Editor of Journal of Perioperative Nursing reflects ACORN’s growing position as a global influencer in perioperative leadership and practice. The journal’s role in continuing to advance the evidence base for perioperative nursing is crucial. I will always treasure the opportunity I have had to be a part of the journal. It has been an honour to contribute to the evidence that guides those who make an impact every day – perioperative nurses.

References